A Letter Expressing Support for Candidate Scott Miller

November 9, 2026

Gentlemen of The Rittenhouse Club,

It is my pleasure to write in support of Scott Miller's membership in The Rittenhouse Club. I first got to know Scott during his application to Wharton and quickly developed a great deal of respect for him, both personally and professionally. Of the many prospective applicants who reached out to me, Scott was the one I felt confident enough to personally advocate for. I wrote a letter of support to the Wharton admissions office on his behalf, and even before his acceptance, I had begun bringing him around and introducing him to people in my own circles. I would not have done so had I not been confident in his character and the kind of person he is.

Scott grew up in New Jersey before attending Harvard, where he played football. Following graduation, he joined the Navy, completed BUD/S, and earned his SEAL Trident. During his time in the SEAL Teams, he went on to qualify as both a Sniper and a Joint Terminal Attack Controller (JTAC), two particularly demanding qualifications. He graduated as the honorman of his Sniper class, deployed to Iraq, and later served as a Sniper Instructor, where he was responsible for training and mentoring future SEAL snipers.

Scott is now pursuing his MBA at Wharton, where he is focused on a career in consulting. He is an active member of both the Wharton Rugby Club and the Wharton Veterans Club, making a consistent effort to attend events and contribute to both communities. He is also married and recently welcomed his first child, now two months old. Despite balancing school, recruiting, and a young family, he makes the time to remain involved. He doesn't simply want to belong to something; he wants to contribute to it.

Beyond his accomplishments, what stands out most to me is Scott's character. He is humble, self-aware, and easy to get along with. He carries himself professionally, with poise, good judgment, and a sense of humor that makes him easy to be around. He is also consistently generous with his time and resources. When my car battery died one morning and left me stranded, Scott immediately offered to come over and jump-start it. It is a small example, but one that reflects his natural willingness to help others, often without being asked or expecting anything in return.

I also believe Scott has a particularly good understanding of what membership in a club like TRC entails. Having both served in the SEAL Teams, we understand that being part of a selective organization is about much more than earning the opportunity to join. There is an expectation that you contribute to the community, uphold its standards, and remain engaged with the people around you. While the organizations are obviously very different, I think the underlying principle is much the same. Scott understands that membership comes with responsibilities, and his willingness to show up and contribute is something I have seen consistently. He has already made an effort to attend a breakfast at TRC, and I believe he would approach membership with that same level of engagement.

My willingness to advocate for Scott, introduce him to people, and offer my own time and resources on his behalf long before he arrived at Wharton reflects the confidence I have in him. I offer my full and unreserved support for his membership and am confident he would be a great addition to The Rittenhouse Club.

Sincerely,

SO2 Alex Bilay
